TECHNOLOGY AND ETHICS

How have changes in technology influenced ethical principles in law, medicine and research? Has 'the law' been too quick or too slow to respond?

We are a Tax Exempt Charity supporting Thalassaemia Research

Welcome

As Chairman of the Greek Conference, I invite you to join us from 19 September to 25 September 2014 to our Costa Navarino Conference, which will take place at the wonderful Romanos Resort, Costa Navarino.

Our professional program, finalized by the Chair of our Papers Committee (Professor Loane Skene) has had invaluable support from our Greek organizing committee.

Costa Navarino offers its visitors the unique opportunity to view history stretching back thousands of years to the ages and origins of traditional Greek mythology. It is also a significant location in respect of Greece's recent history as it is the location of the famous Battle of Navarino which led to Greece's independence from Ottoman rule. Apart from our professional program, we have devised an interesting and stimulating social program, which will enable our participants to see a wide range of sights in the fascinating villages, stunning beaches and countryside.

We are a not-for-profit organization. We support the Murdoch Childrens Research Institute's Cell & Gene Therapy Unit for its research work into the causes and possible cures for thalassaemia. We have over the past eight years donated substantial funds to the Murdoch Childrens Research Institute on an annual basis and are proud of our association with them. We look forward to our Costa Navarino 2014 Conference being able to contribute further towards the outstanding work being undertaken by the Murdoch. This year we welcome our new collaborators, The Hellenic Museum, Melbourne, the European Centre of Public Law and the Centre for Human Reproduction in Athens.

I do hope that you will be able to join us in Costa Navarino in September 2014. I can assure you of a stimulating, enriching and pleasurable week, as well as the opportunity to join with professional colleagues, renew or make friendships and, above all, enjoy all for which Greece is still famed.

Eugenia Mitrakas, OAM
Chairman

As the Greek Patron, I am pleased to extend to you all an invitation to join us at Costa Navarino 2014, and participate in another week of stimulating and thought-provoking presentations. I am delighted to have been involved in all of the six events held in Greece.

Costa Navarino 2014 - Speakers and Participants

Technology and Ethics

How have changes in technology influenced ethical principles in law, medicine and research?
Has 'the law' been too quick or too slow to respond?

In the last generation, there have been many advances in science, technology and medicine. They include increasingly complex organ and tissue transplants; research and developments in stem cell therapies and assisted reproductive treatments; growing knowledge of genetics and its potential applications in 'personalised medicine'; genetically modified crops that may help relieve food shortages in third world countries; and more sophisticated computers and telecommunications systems.

With modern medicine, we can save the lives of tiny premature infants and keep patients alive for longer periods of time. Human bodily material can be stored for years and later used for research and other purposes. It can be sent to other countries for research or treatment; and cell lines and other products can be derived from it. These may be commercialised, perhaps for large rewards. Patients can also go to other countries for procedures that would be unlawful in Australia.

However, many of these developments raise ethical and legal challenges.

Our community is diverse and some people have grave concerns about using science to try to control our lives.

Some object, in particular, to research on embryos and people's personal genetics. Others are worried about making changes that have implications for the future that cannot be undone, or may lead to greater inequities in the community. In many cases, the law has had to respond to new issues, particularly in areas such as assisted reproductive treatments; guardianship; privacy; human rights law and intellectual property. Sometimes, new laws have been enacted but many changes have been made by the case law and professional and ethical guidelines. The law's responses to these dilemmas is fluid and is of course dependent upon community attitudes and political will.

This conference will explore these issues and others that participants will raise. The speakers will put forward ideas from different perspectives, to promote our understanding of how the law and other regulatory mechanisms respond to different types of developments in science and medicine.
